Marlin Strong: Every student, every day, whatever it takes!
"Without humility, you are unable to learn."

Albert Einstein

For students, parents, and educators, humility is essential when it comes to understanding report cards. A report card does not capture everything a student knows or can become. It provides useful information, but it is not a final judgment of ability, effort, or potential.

Humility reminds us that report cards are tools for learning, not labels. Grades and comments show what has been achieved and may hint at how learning is happening, but wisdom comes from asking why—why a student is struggling or succeeding, and what should be done next. Without reflection and action, even the most detailed report card has limited value.

Report cards also have an expiry date. They are snapshots of learning at a moment in time, not predictors of the future. When approached with humility, they become starting points for conversation, growth, and support rather than sources of comparison or pressure.

Ultimately, humility helps us remember that education does not end with a report card. When used thoughtfully, report cards support continuous learning for students and meaningful guidance for those who support them.

Viewing report cards through a lens of humility encourages all involved to focus on growth rather than perfection. It shifts conversations from "What did you get?" to "What did you learn?" and from "What went wrong?" to "What's next?" In doing so, report cards become meaningful guides that support resilience, curiosity, and continuous improvement—qualities that matter far beyond the classroom. Championing Students & Their Learning

Parent Conferences Sign-up opens April 22, 2026

Conferences will be held on April 29, 2026 and April 30, 2026. The PT Conferences will be held in-person or virtually on Teams.
